This talk proposes cultural history and transmedia analysis as productive sites of growth within media industry studies. It presents research on the history of the comic book industry, which has been a cornerstone of corporate US multimedia production for more than sixty years. Arguing that state and economic infrastructures have played a significant role in shaping the texts and social practices that constitute comic book culture, it addresses the dynamic interplay between structural and cultural power.